Commentary

The Select International Alpha Fund returned +0.87% for the month to be +14.27% year-to-date (net, after fees).

The global outlook for 2025 has been marginally upgraded to 3.3% (IMF forecasts) with the US the main economic driver. Economic growth is increasingly becoming uneven across regions with the US economy exhibiting more growth and resilience compared to the EU, UK and China.

While cash rates are anticipated to be lower in the developed economies this year, the more aggressive rate cut expectations are being unwound by the market, given the current robust fiscal policies combined with core inflation remaining a potential challenge for central banks. A shallow cash rate cycle is becoming the consensus view.

The EU region continues to face many challenges given the larger economies, Germany and France, are struggling to grow their export sector and more broadly, private sector activity while navigating many years of regulatory headwinds from Brussels. The economic pulse for the EU region is well below the US with GDP forecast to grow around 1.0%, well below the US forecast of 2.7% for 2025 (IMF forecasts). On the positive side, the Mediterranean economies have performed very well over the past three years and continue to be the larger contributor to EU activity.

China domestic economic conditions and confidence continue to worsen. The balance sheet recession and negative wealth effects will remain a drag, while their export sector continues to perform well leading into the additional tariffs that will follow from a Trump administration.

US equities remain the most confident and trade at more expensive valuations compared to other markets. US earnings this year are expected to grow in the low double-digits, supported by lower corporate taxes and a strong deregulation policy. The unknown will be the impact of tariffs (long and variable lags) however the stronger USD will be less inflationary. The higher US bond yields since September will be a headwind for investors however credit conditions remain in a reasonable shape and withstand the steeper yield curve. Some pockets of volatility over 2025 should be anticipated.

Volatility will be the norm for currency markets this year. The stronger USD will pressure some emerging economies with USD liabilities.

The overweight and focus on disruptive technologies is the core investment theme from the London based investment team lead by Mark Hawtin (who have managed this fund since January 2023).
