Commentary

The K2 Select International Fund returned -3.0% for the month. April was a volatile month for global equity markets.

The increased currency volatility and fall in the AUD late April reinforced market uncertainty with US policy settings. We continue to take the view that support for commodities will remain into year end and subsequent strength in commodity currencies will result. The Fund maintains a hedging strategy that provides some capital protection against a rising AUD.

Uncertainty for markets continued due to ongoing concerns with rising inflation expectations and the implications for US rates. Central bank communication is important for markets and the US Fed has continued to reinforce tighter monetary policy settings ahead from the recent historical lows in rates. This follows their policy pivot in late 2021 as inflation risks continued to build.

The Fed increased rates by 50 basis points to 1.0% (upper band) at their May meeting and flagged to the market that additional 50 basis point rates hikes at their upcoming June and July meetings should be anticipated. A 2.5% Fed Funds rate is the neutral long-term target and would be conducive for stable markets going forward. Getting there within a year will create some pain for markets. In addition to higher US rates, the Quantitative Tightening (QT) will also have an impact for global markets. While addressing inflation risks the US Fed ultimately aims to engineer a soft economic landing.

The positives include good momentum in US earnings, compelling equity valuations, sound corporate credit conditions, high household savings rates and the strong labour market in developed economies. Further, strong wealth effects create some comfort for policy makers that the tighter monetary policy can be absorbed. The risks include ongoing supply chain bottlenecks from the China lockdowns, increasing corporate costs, persistent inflation risks, quantitative tightening (QT) and geopolitical risks. The uncertainty for energy prices is anticipated to persist.

The K2 Select International Fund continues to maintain higher weighting to North America and commodity economies. Our largest weightings include Macquarie Group, Microsoft, VISA, Rio, BHP, Kina Securities and Goldman Sachs. Some of the best performing holdings for the Fund this month were Stanmore Resources, Universal Music Group, Macquarie Group, Svenska Handelsbanken and Kina Securities. Some key underperformers in April include JP Morgan, US Bancorp, Nike, and Walt Disney.
